The Kowalsky Effect You know exactly how much you make per hour and your company pays you on a bi-weekly or monthly basis. The problem is that you don't know what you're earning in comparison to what you could be earning if you worked for someone else, either in your same field or in another (A) field. This is called the "Kowalsky Effect" and it's no myth. Why is the Kowalsky Effect a myth? It is commonly referenced in real estate. You ask your real estate agent what they make per hour and they will tell you. But since they are working for an agency, they aren't making more than what you think they are making. They are making more than they would if they were your realtor, but not as much as they would if they were to work for you, or even for another realtor. You think that they should be making more because you think they are worth more as a realtor. But your company doesn't see it that way. When people are compensated hourly, they assume they are being overpaid. They think that they are worth more, so they assume they should be earning more. But if you were to earn the same hourly rate as them, how could they think they are worth more? Let's say I make $40 an hour and you make $30 an hour. In that case, you think you are making $30 more than me and you should be making $40 an hour. However, if you were to earn $40 an hour, it will only turn out to be $40 an hour. I will make the same amount of money I am making now, plus the same amount of money I would make if I were to be in your company's position. If you were to earn $40 an hour, I'll make $40 per hour. Example #1 You make $20 an hour and you think you are making $25 an hour. In this situation, you are looking at your pay and thinking you are getting paid more than you deserve. You think that if you make $20 an hour, then you should be earning $25 an hour. That's why you need to look at what it is you are making in relation to other workers in your field and what they are earning. If you are in a field where people
