"If your not enjoying yourself, you're not living" Nowadays it seems that everyone is living a kind of extreme sport and I'm not talking about extreme cars and clothes either. No, I'm talking about the extreme gamification of our mundane lives. Free Time. As if we actually have free time. So we create methods of control and structure of our time off in order to make the most of it. We have Facebook groups to announce when we will have free time and reply to any message faster than we would otherwise. Family and friends text/email us requesting that we can do something as well as posting on our Facebook walls that they need our help. We have price tracking apps for our car insurance. We even have cheaper value for money devices built around tracking our time, now how do we even get a chance to use that time? We are overly managed in every aspect of our life and the answer is not more digital tools. The answer is a re-arrangement of how we manage our free time. Managing our time is such a vital part of our lives and it is the basis of everyone's life. We need a replacement of what we use our time for. We need to get back to the basics of managing our time. On the way to install anything on a PC there is usually a lot of bloatware and the like, before you spend too long noticing those things there is usually a few scans or toolbars running in the background. On a Mac though, the bloatware tends to start earlier and it tends to 09e8f5149f
