Once the world's largest pork producer, Kentucky has become a wasteland in a tough political contest. The big pig producers have been heavily pushed by the southerly state's Republican Governor Matt Bevin and by the often-flamboyant U.S. Senate candidate Matt Bevin. Both men hail from western Kentucky, where the once-thriving pig-production industry has struggled with soaring demand for pork from China, a struggling economy, political skulduggery and aging baby boomer producers of their own. Matt Bevin and Trump Matt Bevin has said that the president is a "great man." (File photo) The modern revival of the industry began with an organized effort in 2004 to pass a constitutional amendment that forbids the use of new waterways in the state for any industrial use. In practice, the move was a crusade to block the completion of a $2.6 billion watershed expansion and water diversion project on the Buell River, about 130 kilometres south of Louisville, Kentucky. The Buell Valley project was opposed by the state's pork producers, who grew richer through their promotion of political outsiders. Bevin was one of them. He was first elected to the state's state

Senate in 1992 and in 1998 was elected Governor by the largest margin of victory in Kentucky history, and he was re-elected in 2010. Republicans in the state are hoping that this week's referendum on a new constitution will deliver them a second straight ballot victory, and win them one more term as governor. (Appalachian Access Pipeline) Yet, even before Bevin was finally voted out of office last year, he ran into trouble on the matter of water. Already home to one of the world's largest hog-production operations, the state of Kentucky has also become the home of the largest environmental lawsuit in U.S. history. Buell Industries, which owns 16,000 head of sows and employs 1,500 people, has sued the state for negligence, saying that the state should have known that the Buell expansion would disrupt water 3e33713323
