Brain Microdialysis and Behavioral Testing in Mice. A better understanding of how drugs work in the brain can be achieved by gaining knowledge of the effects of drugs in the brain in their normal, healthy environment. Microdialysis is one of the most appropriate methods to address this research question, as it provides a minimally invasive access to the brain. However, microdialysis requires a certain level of training to be used properly to obtain valid data. Here we describe how to install and use a brain microdialysis system in mice and how to perform the necessary pharmacological challenges to illustrate the required knowledge and expertise. The first part of the procedure is to identify and localize the position of the microdialysis probe and how to leave the probe within the tissue for a prolonged time without causing tissue damage. The second step is to perform drug treatments by implantation of the probe, followed by recovery of the probe. The third step is the collection of dialysate samples, and the last step is the analysis of these samples. It takes around 4-6 h from the initial surgery to the end of the experiment. However, experience gained through repeated use of the procedure allows for rapid improvements and growth in microdialysis application to neuroscience research.
