Photoshop is one of a pair of industry standard image manipulation programs with Illustrator that both Adobe sells. Adobe Illustrator works almost exactly the same way as Photoshop, except that it's geared toward creating vector images and is geared to the creation of artwork with specifically defined shapes and vectors. The two products are used together, usually in the same image, to either create or enhance the vector design. Photoshop CS2 The latest version of Photoshop. Photoshop CS2, introduced a whole new slew of features, including a new Adobe Camera Raw plug-in for the RAW format that lets you examine and potentially modify your RAW image in Camera Raw, and several new features for manipulating images in Photoshop, including basic image resizing (cropping), straightening, resizing images to fit a frame, creating grainy textures, and smoothing, and a number of new brushes and gradients. The new version of Photoshop includes some big changes to the interface. The menu bar is now organized into three parts: Workspace, File, and Edit. Workspace enables you to arrange the display of the tools and palettes, while File houses the Explorer window, which displays your image or documents in folders, and Edit houses the Tools window and Layers palette. The Healing Brush allows you to re-create objects. The Portrait command allows you to straighten out the posture of your subject in a portrait. The Levels tool allows you to even out and correct exposure and contrast. Photoshop now includes a built-in Histogram function and a Levels function. The Content-Aware tool offers new functions such as removing flaws in your image. BCE Inc.'s onerous spectrum price The company has agreed with regulators to spend $17.3 billion — 13.5 times its revenue — to buy 600 MHz spectrum, the government said. Quebecor Inc. agreed to buy two big blocks of the spectrum — one in the East and one in the West — for about $4.65 billion. Story continues below advertisement The sale is about 75 percent higher than the price the company had asked for the spectrum in the auctions last April. The government said the deal will generate $3.6-billion in new annual revenues for BCE and $1-billion annually for Quebecor. However, many smaller competitors have voiced concerns that the large spectrum blocks will be absorbed by smaller rivals, clearing the way for higher prices. Minister of Industry Serge Ménard said the government is confident that the deal will be beneficial to everyone. "This transaction is a win-win," he said. However, it will likely require licences and approvals from U.S. regulators over things like intellectual property rights that will be difficult for companies to get before they close. "This is a complex deal that has to be approved in the United States, and we can't predict in what time frame that will happen," he said. Story continues below advertisement The government also said last week that Bell Canada Inc. and Quebecor agreed to an "equivalence" agreement, which means the new company will receive spectrum licenses for Bell and Quebecor's services. With no small level of irony, the agreement means the government will have to force Bell Canada to sell some of its holdings in BCE. The deal will also mean that Bell, which had put a value of between $20-billion and $30-billion on its spectrum holdings, will have to sell off a few pieces to fund the new investment. Analysts on Monday said while the deal is unlikely to have a dramatic effect on BCE shares, there will likely be a "transition" period in which the company will have more uncertainty. "The day-to-day trading will not change much over the next few months but there will be some transition, particularly in terms of pricing models and investments," said Phillip Swirsky, an analyst with Royal Bank Capital Markets. He said the spectrum that will be coming up for sale in the auction next year is worth more than what the

What's New In?

Andrea Chen, the only woman elected to the US House of Representatives from Virginia, is marking her first 100 days in office as a congressional delegation with a thorough media blitz of appearances across the state to discuss funding for her small business tech innovation program. "So many small business owners say their biggest problem is getting the capital needed to grow and hire," Chen tells NBC7. "This has been a big issue for me as a small business owner." A biostatistician at the National Institute of Dental and Craniofacial Research, Chen's company, SBMBioTech, is poised to transform the way dental professionals around the world diagnose and treat periodontal disease. She says that's the main thing she's been running into when she meets with other small business owners. "You think about it, it's just like when you have to go to your health care provider — you're going in to talk about your teeth, so that's why I picked this line of work." SBMBioTech recently announced it's bringing to market a new diagnostic test that will allow dentists to quickly detect periodontal disease and diagnose the severity of the infection they're seeing. Patients with the ailment may not experience any symptoms. The disease can eventually cause tooth loss. "So far, they've been able to see the infection — the inflammation — but they didn't have any way of knowing the severity of it," Chen says. "That's what we're trying to do." So far, SBMBioTech has raised $3.5 million to test and commercialize their technology, and is seeking an additional $5 million to do so. "It's important that we also be able to track this disease over time and see how it continues to progress and get even worse over time," Chen says. Healthcare can be confusing and expensive, and then adding dental issues can make it even more challenging. "You're paying through the nose for it and they can't really tell you anything, so that's why I wanted to do something more and more in this field," Chen says. If Chen has her way, every dental professional
