According to several news reports today, the White House is refusing to cooperate with the House GOP controlled Committee tasked with an investigation of Trump's potential obstruction of justice. Can the GOP controlled House refuse to subpoena the White House? I think this situation is similar to when a grand jury refuses to subpoena a company. How does the House handle that? A: It is difficult to say what the mechanism would be for the House to refuse to subpoena the White House, but there are two possibilities. In the first, the subpoenaed party could seek a court order (in a civil suit, usually) enjoining the other party from disobeying the subpoena. As noted in the linked Wikipedia article, civil suits are rarely used to compel judicial or other officials to perform their official duties, but they are an option if one party can convince the court that the other party is unlikely to comply with the order. In the second, the majority party could pass a law (technically not a subpoena) that says the other party can no longer disobey the subpoena. This is how the House has handled the situation where the
