I am using percentages for position. For example an image is positioned as 5% and spans from the left of the text to the right. I have been using this method for positioning on websites for quite a while now, and always seems to work good for me but I am getting a feeling that this is not the normal way of doing things. Can somebody explain what is the correct way of doing this? A: The only real gotcha with percentages is that they can get messed up by browsers that don't support CSS3 properties. For pixel-based layouts, it's generally a good idea to use a wrapper that contains the element you're positioning as well as the inner elements that it needs to contain, but if you're working with an element that inherently has a container (such as the body) you can use percentages as you would with the "normal" floats.
