For decades, the U.S. military's procurement processes have been governed by a bureaucratic institution known as the "whiz kid." The "whiz kid" refers to an acronym for "young, aggressive, talented, imaginative" and it's a common metaphor for the way "whiz kids" gain familiarity with the world by learning to operate sophisticated technology. The whiz kid brings innovation to a process that generally draws on the input of a mix of people. "The idea is, we take lots of different experts and get them to cooperate and come up with a solution to a very specific problem," says Weili Chen, author of The Whiz Kid Contract. Whiz kids used to drive everything from nuclear power plant launches to the design of bridges, and they are now helping the military develop next-generation fighter jets like the F-35 Joint Strike Fighter. JSTARS, the modernized version of the venerable U.S. Navy's early warning system, was developed by the Whiz Kid. The Air Force's Palantir system was invented by two young graduates of Stanford University. The F-35 Joint Strike Fighter was conceived by a team of mathematicians and engineers at Lockheed Martin, a noted Lockheed Martin is a recognized heavyweight in the aerospace industry, having developed the U.S. military's F-16 and F-22 fighter jets. Whiz kids are known for taking calculated risks to improve the tools and processes that protect society, and the F-35 is one of the best recent examples of a Whiz Kid aircraft project. But at some point, the F-35 project
