King Louis would have done well to find a backbone and assume control of the kingdom. He did not. An adulterous wife and a barren monarchy were the consequences of that folly. Our world has already suffered enough from governments that ignore the collective power of millions. Who can trust a government that, bound by its own laws and traditions, could possibly rise above the brutish complacency of its citizens to join in the task of self-governance? The harsh lessons of history provide the answer: The only way to govern is with an iron hand, often a cruel one; to hold us in a singularly coercive and demanding embrace. And we need to resist that call. Yet we are weaker than we think. The struggle for individual liberty is largely a social activity. Never mind the value of individual freedom—we have been given that. We merely need to exercise it, and we can extend the freedom of others. None of us can gain individual freedom alone, and we must urge those around us to join us in that struggle. It is not enough to seek freedom for ourselves; we must reach out to others. It takes no special message, as old as the history of man, to tell us that we must be free. Our capacity for love, our innate sense of justice, and the long record of suffering endured by those who strive for freedom, even when they lose, are the evidence that freedom is what we want. And so it is the task of mankind to walk forward together, each on our own, yet moving as one. No comments: Search This Blog About Me A Southern Yankee whom the Lord seems to have led to the streets.
