A considerable amount of interest has focused on the methylation patterns of CpG islands, which have been shown to play a key role in regulating gene transcription and which are frequently, if not universally, altered in cancer. Several epidemiologic studies have examined the association between folate intake and cancer risk. High folate intake is thought to protect against cancer. We review the epidemiologic evidence for an inverse association between folate intake and colon cancer risk, and the evidence linking low folate intake with breast and prostate cancer risk. Epidemiologic studies have consistently shown an inverse association between folate intake and colon cancer. The magnitude of the association varies from a 50% reduction in the risk for overall cancer incidence to a 60–80% reduction in the risk of colon cancer in high folate consumers compared with those who consumed low amounts of folate. The evidence for an association between reduced folate intake and breast cancer risk is limited and inconsistent; however, a consistent inverse association between low folate intake and prostate cancer risk has been reported. These protective effects on cancer risk have been largely attributed to the activity of folate in the one-carbon metabolism pathway, which mediates the transfer of methyl groups from folate to various biomolecules. The enzymes of this pathway include methylenetetrahydrofolate reductase (MTHFR), 5,10-methylenetetrahydrofolate reductase, and methionine synthase. Genetic polymorphisms in these folate-related

Our experience from 1976 to 1984. Apropos of 42 case-reports]. The Authors report their experience of twenty years of mitral endocarditis. The diagnosis was secured at the first examination with a high index of suspicion. In each case they used a broad spectrum antibiotic therapy (recommended in Italy for prophylaxis). In 10 cases they performed excision of the infected tissue, or transvalvular approach and in 4 cases a valvulotomy. One case developed a recurrence with a foreign body particle; the others, with a polymicrobial infection. All patients survived.Trump Signs Executive Order Delaying Work on the Dakota Access Pipeline The government of the United States of America has officially postponed construction of the Dakota Access Pipeline at the request of the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe and the city of North Dakota. Trump has signed an order declaring the Dakota Access Pipeline to be "subject to the approval process currently prescribed by law" and has prohibited federal agencies from funding the pipeline's construction in the near future. The pipeline was constructed by Energy Transfer Partners, a Texas-based company, and has been met with opposition since 2016, when the Obama administration authorized the construction of the pipeline. Opponents fear that the potential for pipeline leaks and spills could affect drinking water for the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe and its allies. There is currently no timeline for when construction of the Dakota Access Pipeline could resume. This is a great victory for the Standing Rock Sioux Tribe. I hope you all get the help you deserve.
